Introduction

The microfilm of the Henry Louis Mencken Papers, which consists of 69 rolls, was prepared by the New York Public Library under the sponsorship of the National Historical Publications and Records Commission. On the film are some 30,000 letters which account for most of Mencken's literary correspondence. This collection was given to the New York Public Library in 1956, but remained closed to readers until 1971.

Mencken did not deposit all his correspondence with the New York Public Library. His correspondence with Marylanders is at Baltimore's Enoch-Pratt Library. There are smaller collections of Mencken Papers at some 80 libraries throughout the United States.

Reconstructing the Mencken archive was a formidable task. Mencken rarely asked his secretary, Mrs. Rosalind Lohrfink, to make carbon copies of his outgoing correspondence. Luckily, most of his post-1932 letters did survive in her shorthand notebooks. After Mencken decided to preserve his archive, Mrs. Lohrfink began to transcribe these notebooks. Her transcriptions account for most of the Mencken letters on this film.

In addition to the correspondence, the papers include typescript copies of some of Mencken's editorials and reviews. There are also a few literary manuscripts that were submitted to Mencken for possible publication.

What follows is an inventory of the New York Public Library's Henry Louis Mencken Papers. The literary rights are owned by the Mercantile Safe Deposit and Trust Company of Baltimore, Maryland.

Biographical Sketch

Henry Louis Mencken was born on September 12, 1880. Both of his grandfathers had come to the United States from Germany in 1848 searching for economic opportunity. Burkhardt Ludwig Mencken founded the family cigar business in Baltimore. Henry's father, August, was completely devoted to the firm. He was a typical late nineteenth century businessman, both socially and politically conservative.

Henry Mencken was a product of this German-American, middle class ethos. He learned to value hard work, intellectual achievement, and upward mobility. He attended the Baltimore Polytechnic Institute and in 1896 graduated valedictorian. He, however, came to prefer literature and journalism to science. His father sought to discourage his interest in newspaper work. Failing to do so, he forced Henry to work in the family cigar business.

After the elder Mencken died on January 13, 1899, Henry got a job as a cub reporter for the Baltimore Morning Herald. He enjoyed his work immensely. Showing a talent for dramatic criticism, he was soon given his own column. When that succeeded he was named managing editor. Soon after this appointment was made, the Morning Herald folded, but Mencken's reputation was untarnished and he was asked to join the staff of the Baltimore Evening Sun. Mencken was to maintain this association for the rest of his life, writing the column "Free Lance" in which he expressed his views on literature, politics and society.

During the period before the First World War, Mencken laid the basis for his national reputation as a literary critic. In 1908, he became book review editor for The Smart Set. Here, he met George Jean Nathan, a young drama critic who was to become his close friend and editorial partner. Mencken and Nathan devoted themselves to the task of upgrading American literature. They sought to make young American authors more aware of the currents of European fiction, particularly the realistic novels of Thomas Mann and Marcel Proust. By and large, they were convinced that American culture, with its emphasis on materialism, hampered good writing. Theodore Dreiser was one of the few American authors whom they respected. When his novel, The Genius, was banned in 1916, they took the lead in the campaign against censorship.

After the First World War, The Smart Set faced a series of reverses. Small budgets, and a growing problem with censorship led Mencken to abandon the magazine. He now wanted to write for a journal that was free from the vagaries of the literary marketplace. In 1924, he convinced the publisher Alfred A. Knopf to take a chance on launching a new magazine, The American Mercury. In this journal of sociology and politics, Mencken satirized the business civilization and corrupt politicians who dominated America of the 1920's. For a while he was one of America's most highly acclaimed social critics. During the thirties, however, he began to lose his following as he directed his acerbic sarcasm at Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. Mencken realized that he was breasting currents too strong for him, so he retired from The American Mercury in 1933.

Mencken spent the latter part of his life writing for the Baltimore Sun and encouraging young literary talent. He was constantly revising his classic American Language which was first published in 1918, but whose final supplement was not completed until 1948. That year, Mencken suffered a stroke and was virtually disabled until his death in 1956.
