Creator History

Painter, specializing in portraits, Beauford Delaney was born in Knoxville, Tennessee in 1901. An art teacher with whom he studied in Knoxville encouraged him to get further training in Boston, where he studied at three schools. Arriving in New York in 1929, he began meeting and painting many of the prominent black personalities, such as W.E.B. DuBois and W.C. Handy. As an admirer of jazz and other forms of music, he later made portraits of Duke Ellington, Ethel Waters, Louis Armstrong and Marion Anderson. Delaney exhibited in several locales in New York, and in the late 1940's he began his association with the Roko Gallery. During this period he also became acquainted with James Baldwin and Henry Miller, who would become his life long friends. In 1953 he planned to visit Rome for a few months, instead his brief stop in Paris extended until his death in 1979.

Delaney's work was exhibited at many galleries in Paris from the late 1960's through the early 1970's, where at one point his paintings were described as being completely independent from the currents of the art world. Many of his works of the late 1950's to early 1960's were abstracts and art critics often commented on his unique use of light and color. Delaney was influenced by European art music and African art. After suffering from two nervous breakdowns, Delaney died in Paris in 1979.

Scope and Content Note

The Beauford Delaney Letters (1958-1963) consist of 18 autograph letters from Delaney to his friend Lynn Stone in New York City, two letters to Stone from artist Charles Boggs, a handwritten draft with typewritten copy of a fundraising letter by author James Baldwin and two letters from Edward C. Califano, director of Galerie Internationale, New York City.

The correspondence between Delaney and Stone is primarily of a personal nature in which Delaney discusses mutual friends, his philosophy of life, the importance of friendship, etc. However there is also frequent mention of plans for a proposed National Urban League fundraising exhibition (1963) in cooperation with Galerie Internationale. Other topics include exhibitions in which Delaney is currently showing, his artistic production in general, as well as other artists including composer Howard Swanson, painter Charles Boggs and author James Baldwin. In one letter (January 11, 1963) Delaney discusses writer/photographer Carl Van Vechten and his role as patron of black artists. In the same letter he discusses artist Al Hirschfeld and others who own pieces of his work, also a documentary film (1960) made by Television Francaise in which he appears. Another letter (October 20, 1962) contains a partial list of private individuals owning some of Delaney's work.

James Baldwin writes in his capacity as chairman of the Sponsoring Committee to raise initial funds for the proposed National Urban League fundraising exhibition of Delaney's work. The letter also emphasizes the committee's second goal, to bring wider recognition, within the United States, to the work of Beauford Delaney. Baldwin also refers to Delaney as his spiritual father, to whom he owes a tremendous debt.

The correspondence from Charles Boggs to Stone (1962) primarily discusses proposed plans for Delaney's coming to New York for the National Urban League's fundraising exhibition. In addition, some discussion is devoted to Delaney's mental and physical health as well as to his views on race-related matters. Delaney's relationship with gallery owner Paul Facchetti of Paris is also heavily emphasized.

The two letters (1963) from Galerie Internationale's director Edward C. Califano discuss the proposed fundraising exhibition and details regarding representation, sales, commissions etc.
