

The New York Public Library
Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture,
Manuscripts, Archives and Rare Books Division

Guide to the

Booker T. Washington correspondence

bulk 1889-1913

Sc MG 182

Summary

Creator: Washington, Booker T., 1856-1915

Title: Booker T. Washington correspondence

Date: bulk 1889-1913

Source: Letter dated February 3, 1909, gift of Don Fowle, SCM79-10. Letter dated December 29, 1904, gift of John Strachan, SCM81-21. SCM82-76 from the Miscellaneous American Letters and Papers Collection.

Abstract: Educator, writer, founder of Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. Material consists of letters from Washington to Emily Howland, a benefactor of the Tuskegee Institute. Letters cover a wide variety of issues, including requests for financial assistance, progress reports, and annual reports of the Board of Directors of the Institute, as well as informal reports on his activities. The letters reveal frank expressions of his feelings regarding criticism he received from blacks, 1904; his surprise at being asked to speak at the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta, 1895, where he delivered his now-famous accommodationist speech; and a forceful statement of support for black people's efforts to protect their constitutional rights, 1900. Also, several letters in which he discussed the administrative problems at the Kowaliga School, a school for black children in Alabama, 1896-1898, and the response to his autobiographical articles which appeared in OUTLOOK MAGAZINE. Letters to Francis Jackson Garrison, son of the abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, deal with diverse subjects including the conflict between Washington and William Monroe Trotter, editor of the BOSTON GLOBE. Letters regarding the Brownsville affair, 1906, and the Atlanta riot of 1906. Also, letters from Mrs. Margaret Washington to Emily Howland.

Access: Some collections held by the Manuscripts, Archives and Rare Books Division of the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture are held off-site and must be requested in advance. Please check the collection records in the NYPL's online catalog for detailed location information. To request access to materials in the Manuscripts, Archives and Rare Books Division, please visit: http://archives.nypl.org/scm/request_access

Preferred citation: [Item], Booker T. Washington correspondence, Sc MG 182, Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, Manuscripts, Archives and Rare Books Division, The New York Public Library

Language of the Material: English

Processing note: D. Carter/D. Lachatanere, April 30, 1984

Creator History

Booker Taliaferro Washington was born April 5, 1856 in Franklin County, Virginia. His mother, Jane, was the slave of a small planter, and his father was a white man. He was the middle child of three, having an older brother, John, and a younger sister, Amanda.

At the age of nine Booker, along with his family, moved to Malden, West Virginia, where they joined his stepfather, Washington Ferguson. In 1871, Booker began work as a houseboy for the wife of General Lewis Ruffner, owner of the coal mines. Mrs. Ruffner, a strict New Englander, was to exert a very important influence on Booker's life. In Malden, Washington attended school while working in the mines, acquiring some fundamentals of an education. In 1872, at the age of sixteen, he entered Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute in Virginia. Arriving penniless, he was given work as a janitor to pay the cost of his room and board. The founder and principal, Samuel Chapman Armstrong, arranged for a benefactor to pay Washington's tuition. Washington studied academic subjects and agriculture; his special interests were public speaking and debate. At his commencement he was chosen to give a class address. Washington derived much of his educational philosophy from Armstrong, one of the foremost proponents of industrial education for blacks.

After graduating from Hampton with honors in 1875, Washington returned to Malden to teach school. In 1878 he went to Washington, D. C., where he spent eight months as a student at Wayland Seminary, an institution with an entirely academic program. In 1879 he returned to Hampton to teach in a program for American Indians.

In 1881 General Armstrong recommended Washington for the position of principal at the newly established normal school at Tuskegee, Alabama. Washington was offered the position and accepted responsibility for an institution that at the time of his arrival lacked land, buildings, and appropriations for anything other than salaries.

Washington went to work to sell the idea of the school and to recruit students from black families while at the same time seeking the support of local whites. The school opened in a shanty lent by a black church. Eventually an abandoned plantation on the outskirts of Tuskegee was purchased with funds borrowed from the treasurer of Hampton Institute. Students built a kiln to make bricks, and within a few years a classroom, dining room, dormitory and chapel had been built. By 1888 the school owned 540 acres of land and had an enrollment of more than 400. It offered training in trades such as carpentry, cabinetmaking, printing, shoemaking and tinsmithing. Through their own labor students supplied most of the needs of the school.

Much of Washington's time was spent in raising money for Tuskegee and publicizing its philosophy. His success in securing financial aid from Northern philanthropists was one of his most remarkable achievements. His work as an educator, however, was only one part of his many-faceted career. His national fame as an orator was established when he addressed the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta on September 18, 1895. The accommodationist speech, which was about fifteen minutes in length, was enthusiastically received by the audience and widely reported in the press. Washington's fame was also spread by his writings, especially his autobiography Up from Slavery, which was published in book form in 1901. When Theodore Roosevelt became president, Washington held far more political power than any other black person.

The essence of Washington's philosophy was that through hard work, thrift, self-help and economic progress blacks would improve their status and be accepted by whites.

In 1896 Harvard University gave Washington an honorary M. A. degree, the first granted by the University to a black person. In 1902 he began attending the national conventions of the National Afro-American Council in which he played a guiding role. He served as president of the National Negro Business League until his death in 1915.

Washington was married three times. He married Fannie N. Smith in 1882. She died in 1884, leaving an infant daughter Portia. His second wife, Olivia A. Davidson, whom he married in 1885, died four years later, leaving him with two sons. In 1893 he married Margaret Murray, the first woman principal at Tuskegee. Washington died of arteriosclerosis and overwork in Tuskegee on November 14, 1915, at age 59. He was buried on a hill overlooking Tuskegee institute in a brick tomb made by the students.

Scope and Content Note

The Booker T. Washington Collection covers the period 1889-1913. The material consists of letters from Washington to two principal correspondents, Emily Howland and Francis J. Garrison.

The majority of the letters are those written to Emily Howland, a benefactor of Tuskegee Institute. The letters cover a variety of issues, including requests for financial assistance, progress reports and the annual reports to the Board of Directors of the Institute, as well as informal reports on his activities. The letters reveal frank expressions of his feelings regarding the criticism he received from black people (January 19, 1904), his surprise at being asked to speak at the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta (September 6, 1895) where he delivered his now-famous accommodationist speech (a photocopy of the handwritten speech is in the collection, folder 1), and a forceful statement of support for black people's efforts to protect their constitutional rights (October 15, 1900). In addition, there are several letters in which he discussed some of the administrative problems at the Kowaliga School, a school for black children in Alabama (1896-98) and the response to his autobiographical articles which appeared in Outlook Magazine.

The letters to Francis Jackson Garrison (1848-1916), the son of the abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, similarly deal with a number of subjects. Among the Washington-Garrison letters of particular interest are those concerning the conflict between Washington and William Monroe Trotter (August 3, 1903, May 8, 17, 1905). Trotter, editor of the Boston Guardian, was philosophically opposed to Washington on a number of issues. Also, two letters regarding the Brownsville Affair (December 3, 1906 and attachment) and the Atlanta riot of 1906 (October 2, 1906). There are also letters from Mrs. Margaret Washington to Emily Howland. Two letters to William E. Curtis (January 24, 1905, April 1, 1905) are also of interest. The first discusses Washington's dinner at the White House and the second includes a list of black men in government service who received presidential appointments.

Key Terms

Subjects

African American teachers

African American universities and colleges -- Alabama -- Tuskegee

African Americans -- Civil rights

African Americans -- Education

Exhibitions -- Georgia -- Atlanta
Riots -- Georgia -- Atlanta
Schools -- Alabama

Geographic Names

Alabama -- Social conditions
Atlanta (Ga.) -- Social conditions
Brownsville (Tex.) -- Social conditions

Names

Garrison, Francis Jackson, 1848-1916
Howland, Emily, 1827-1929
Trotter, William Monroe, 1872-1934
Washington, Booker T., 1856-1915
Washington, Margaret James Murray, 1865-1925
Cotton States Exposition (1895 : Atlanta, Ga.)
Kowaliga School (Ala.)
Tuskegee Institute

Container List

CORRESPONDENCE

- b. 1 f. 1 1899-1899
- b. 1 f. 2 1900-1904
- b. 1 f. 3 1905-1913